INTRODUCTION

The Orpheus myth is central to the symbolic representation of the power of music, synonymous with the birth of opera itself. In his wide-ranging article “Orpheus, Ovid and Opera,” Frederick Sternfeld cites twenty settings of the Orpheus myth from 1599–1699, including intermedii, ballets, and masques, as well as operas.¹ Within the genre of the Italian chamber cantata (not included in Sternfeld’s table of Orpheus settings), there are also several notable Orfeo settings. Probably the most widely performed of these—no doubt due to the popularity of its composer, Giovanni Battista Pergolesi—is the cantata Nel chiuso centro (two recitatives and arias) for soprano, strings, and continuo, presumed to be composed during the period 1730–35.

A more recent discovery is the cantata Ove per gl’antri infausti for soprano and basso continuo by the Roman cellist/composer Giovanni Lorenzo Lulier (1662–after 1700), cellist of the renowned concertino of Corelli, and known almost always (as in the case of this cantata) by the nickname “Giovannino del Violone.” Although the existence of this cantata was already known through a document in the Pamphili archive with the copy date 1685, the full text of this cantata was not published until its discovery and description by Biancamaria Brumana in a manuscript held in a private collection in Perugia.² Occupying a position, chronologically and stylistically, between these two Orfeo cantatas is Alessandro Scarlatti’s L’Orfeo, “Dall’oscura magion” (H.173).³ The most substantial of these three settings, with five recitatives and arias, it is preceded by an instrumental introduction of three short linked movements. A briefer treatment of the Orfeo story for soprano and basso continuo is Poi ché riseppe Orfeo (H.572), included as a work of questionable attribution in Hanley’s catalogue⁴ but subsequently accepted as a work of Scarlatti by Malcolm Boyd in his edition of Scarlatti cantatas in facsimile and in the Works catalogue of Grove Music.

Alessandro Scarlatti’s L’Orfeo is a passionate telling of the Orpheus story from an unusual and courtly perspective: the narrator’s predicament as suffering lover becomes part of the narration itself. The tale of Orfeo occupies the first four recitatives and arias, greatly contrasted in key, tessitura, and affect. The narrator then steps forward with a postscript to his lover Filli: “Seeing the suffering of Orpheus, how can you fail to take pity on me, as I too have lost my heart looking at you?” In the final aria, addressed to the listening Filli, the narrator reinforces his claim to her mercy through the expression of his sympathy with the mythical lover.

The opportunity to compare the lengthy (anonymous) text of Scarlatti’s Orfeo cantata with the text of Lulier’s Ove per gl’antri infausti, shows that this framing of the myth with the narrator’s own plea to elicit the sympathy of his lady was already established in the 1685 work.

A subsequent treatment of this subject, also entitled ‘Orpheus, Ovid, and Opera’ appears in Frederick W. Sternfeld, The Birth of Opera, (Oxford, Clarendon Press, 1993), Chapter 1, 1–30.

² Biancamaria Brumana, in “‘Ove per gl’Antri infausti’: Miti classici e sventurati amanti in un manoscritto di cantate romane del tardo seicento” Recercare 17 (2005): 161–209, describes the manuscript held in a private collection in Perugia, which contains 24 cantatas for solo voice and continuo. She reproduces in facsimile the complete cantata by Lulier, together with complete transcriptions of the 24 texts.

³ The catalogue by Edwin Hanley, “Alessandro Scarlatti’s ‘Cantate da Camera’: A Bibliographical Study” (Ph.D. diss., Yale University, 1963) is the source of the “H” catalogue numbers of Scarlatti’s chamber cantatas.

⁴ Hanley, 404; Malcolm Boyd (ed.) Cantatas by Alessandro Scarlatti, Vol. XIII; The Italian Cantata in the Seventeenth Century (New York: Garland, 1986).

Here it occupies the final three lines of Lulier's cantata, which is set throughout in a fluid alternation of recitative/arioso/ aria. As Brumana observes, the cantata text moves in compressed time scale from a kind of combined invocation of Monteverdi's Orfeo and Arianna ("o rendetemi il mio ben/ o lasciatemi morir") to the "lieto fine" in which Euridice rises and "uscì nel mondo." Turning to his listener, Lulier's narrator asks her why she enjoys his pain as, in this story, even Hell has mercy on Orfeo. The music takes on a new and cheerful color, maybe portraying the lady's disregard for his feeling.

Donna, tu che d'amor sprezzi l'impero, perché gioisci al mio dolore eterno, s'ha pietà d'un amante anche l'inferno?⁵	Lady, you who scorn the sway of love, why do you take pleasure at my eternal pain, if even Hell has pity on a lover?

The comparable passage in Scarlatti's cantata is not based on the happy ending, however. Orfeo's plan to return for a second attempt to save Euridice falls on the deaf ears of Pluto's boatman, and the lovers remain forever separated. And the narrator's plea is based on the parallel to Orfeo's story of a forbidden glance that leads to loss:

Filli, tu che pietosa ascoltasti d'Orfeo, l'istoria lagrimosa che per un sguardo d'ogni suo ben fu privo perché non hai pietà de' danni miei s'ancor io per mirarti il cor perdei?	Filli, you who have listened sympathetically to the sorry tale of Orpheus, who for one glance was deprived of his beloved, why don't you take pity on my woe, since I too lost my heart looking at you?
---	---

Another similarity between the texts of Lulier's and Scarlatti's Orfeo settings involves the aria "Col pianto mi vanto" (Lulier)/ "Il vanto del canto" (Scarlatti). Not only do the two arias share meter and rhyme scheme, they occur at comparable points in Orfeo's narrative. Scarlatti's aria, like Lulier's captures the dactylic patterns of the text with a repeated motive of two sixteenth notes and one eighth note; though with typical Scarlattian complexities introduced through tied notes and phrase extensions. Either these parallels between Lulier's and Scarlatti's Orfeo settings are purely coincidental (which seems unlikely), or they indicate Scarlatti's awareness of the earlier cantata, possibly through the contact of both musicians with Cardinal Benedetto Pamphili, for whom Lulier's Ove per gl'Antri infausti was copied in 1685.

⁵ Brumana, 161.

Lulier

“Col pianto mi vanto
placar l’empietà.
Non sento il tormento
ch’amore l’ardore
d’inferno più eterno
nel core mi dà.” (2 stanzas)

“With weeping I claim to soften cruelty.
I do not feel the torment
that love, more eternal than the burning of Hell
gives my heart.”

Scarlatti

“Il vanto del canto
mi toglie il dolor.
La pena raffrena
gl’accenti potenti
e atroce la voce
mi chiude nel cor.”

“The pride of singing
takes away my suffering.
Pain checks
my potent accents
And cruelly, it fixes the voice
within my heart.”

The diversity and range of the aria types found in Scarlatti’s L’Orfeo is remarkable. They portray the “great singer of the Ebrus” expressing first his anguish at losing Euridice (Aria 1, m. 62), then defiance (Aria 2, m. 106) which gives way to a central cantabile aria of great calm (Aria 3, m. 184) that depicts Orpheus bewitching the trees and beasts with his singing. The remaining arias move towards the narrator’s perspective, with a reflection on the relief normally given by singing, except in these harrowing circumstances (Aria 4, m. 261)—sung by Orpheus, but equally applicable to the narrator. The final aria is the narrator’s plea for mercy. As if to give a musical equivalent to the distance between narrator and story, Arias 1, 2, and 4 are composed as strongly characterized violin pieces, while the voice declaims the text as a commentary rather than as melodic line. In Aria 5 (m. 302), voice and unison violins are brought together for the first time in close contrapuntal dialogue, anticipating Filli’s “single moment of mercy.”

Aria 3 “Sordo il tronco” is the most substantial aria of the cantata in terms of duration and also the most transparent. Here the tension of the cantata is dissolved as magically as Orpheus’s power works over the beasts and trees. Indicated as a piece for “bowed instruments, violins and violoncello solo,” and omitting any figured bass, this is a low-voiced string piece that evokes the sound of a viol consort. Here, for the only time in the cantata, the voice delivers a beautiful melodic line with simple chordal accompaniment.

The contrast between this aria and the preceding one is striking in terms of tonality, sound, tempo, and affect. Aria 2 in F-sharp minor sounds the note of highest tension in the work, through the high tessitura of the vocal and unison violin parts, the breathless pacing of the violin phrases, and the questioning unresolved musical phrases (“Why don’t you kill me?”). Immediately following this harsh aria of self-condemnation comes the tranquil centre of the work evoking the magic sweetness of Orpheus’ lyre and singing. The sharp key and high tessitura of Aria 2 (F-sharp minor) melts in the sweet thirds of F major and the generally low pitch centre of the melodic line and accompanying strings. Such juxtapositions of tessitura, tonality, and affect are characteristic of Alessandro Scarlatti’s tonal designs. Here, consecutive arias in F-sharp minor and F major provide the central point of contrast, within a scheme in which E minor is the overall tonic, with A minor and F-sharp being the keys of the remaining arias (Aria 1 and Aria 4).

Equally expressive is the recitativo writing: notable examples are the closing passage of Recitativo 1 (m. 59), with its jagged vocal line expressing the “bitter pain” (“l’acerbe pene”) of Orpheus, and the chromatic arioso of Recitativo 3 (m. 162) in which Orpheus invokes the power of his lyre’s strings to “sweeten my cruel sufferings” (“Voi raddolcite i miei crudeli affanni”). Most dramatic of the recitativo closing passages is the change of key to F-sharp minor, effected suddenly in the final phrase of Recitativo 2 (m. 104), with its memory of the “cruel asp which killed [Euridice].”

Scarlatti also set a text from the perspective of Euridice, Del lagrimoso lido, H. 183, soprano and continuo, dated June 17, 1699 (ed. R. Halton, Cantata Editions.com), in which Euridice protests against her fate tormented by the “monsters of hell.” The tonal polarity of F major / F-sharp minor is again present in this cantata (Arias 2 and 3 respectively), with a comparable modulation at the end of the final recitative, aligned with the words “e in un istante l’avvelenato l’umore/ portò la morte al core” moving the tonality from B minor to C-sharp minor — a coincidence that would suggest that such stark tonal contrasts were identified for Scarlatti with extreme situations: in the case of these two cantatas, the memory of the moment in which Euridice receives the fatal snake bite.

Scarlatti’s command of such tonal contrasts was already fully developed by the 1690s. L’Orfeo is undated in the sources, but several structural features indicate a work based in his late seventeenth-century style: the presence of two strophes in several of the arias, more often than not a seventeenth-century feature in Scarlatti’s cantatas; the avoidance of Da Capo form in one aria (Aria 2); the multiple aria structure, with five recitatives and arias; the confident handling of tonal contrasts; and finally, the bold and wide-ranging lines of the recitativo writing, for example the final measures of Recitativo 1 which matches the writing of several dramatic seventeenth-century cantatas of Scarlatti, including Lucretia Romana (H.377, 1688—see WLSCM No. 7) and Tormentatemi pur (H.724)—undated but clearly an early work of Scarlatti judged by its through-composed structure.

There is some basis, however, to suggest a date of composition close to or just after the turn of the eighteenth century. While D-MÜs 3931 is a single-work manuscript, the manuscript F-Pn D.11857 may contain clues as to dating from consideration of the other contents. In addition to La beltà ch’io sospiro (H. 353), of which the composer’s autograph is held in D-MÜs 3987 dated 16 August 1701/2,⁶ some other works also found in the partially autograph manuscript with the date 1701/2 include Son le nere pupilette (H. 668, 12 March, 1702) and Amor con l’idol mio (H.47, 3 April, 1702). Further investigation may reveal evidence as to whether these dated works are to be connected with the date of composition of L’Orfeo. In any case it may be considered a work that exhibits the richness of Scarlatti’s poetic imagination in the context of his late-seventeenth-century style.

Evaluation of the two manuscript sources

Each of the sources is rich in detail familiar from the composer’s autographs (which in the case of this work is not extant). This includes figuring of the basso continuo, dynamic markings, and in Aria 3, the opening direction “Violini, e Violoncello solo/i” is in common between the two sources though each has an additional direction that explains why there are no figures in this aria: “senza Cembalo” in F-Pn, while D-MŪs gives (as also in Sul margine d'un Rivo, D-MŪs 3908), “Strom.[en]ti d'Arco.” This variant and several others, notably the variant notation of the opening dotted section of the Introduttione, suggest that these copies were made independently of one another. The high degree of correspondence between the readings makes it difficult to prefer one over the other. D-MŪs 3931 is a hand well-known to researchers of Alessandro Scarlatti’s cantatas, Hanley’s “Scribe A,” who “copied works from the 1680s on,” with the added credentials that he “shared the copying of MS B-Bc, F.2351, Il Ciro (1711), with Scarlatti himself.”¹⁰

⁷ The difficulty in deciding between 1701 and 1702 in MŪs 3987 is caused by the fact that the last digit of the year appears to have been changed in a number of the works including “La beltà ch’io sospiro”. Hanley’s opinion is that in this case the date 1702 has been changed to 1701. Hanley, 277–78.

⁹ Wladimir Stasoff, L'Abbé Santini et sa collection musicale à Rome (Florence, 1854), specifically mentions a cantata he calls “Orphée” in his entry on Alessandro Scarlatti (p. 61), beginning the entry with the description “Un très grand nombre de cantates de chambre et d’airs de théâtres....” He then names works (“Orphée, Endymion, Fenice, la partenza, cantates [sic]; cantate pastorale”) that have the catalogue numbers 3931 (L'Orfeo), 3927 (Endimione e Cintia), 3928 (La Fenice), 3932 (La Partenza), and (assumed) 3926 (cantata “Notte di Natale,” 1705). As the earliest publication on the Santini Collection, it may be assumed that this list represents a sample of manuscripts, mainly by Scarlatti, that were acquired and already kept together.

Though this copyist of F-Pn D.11857 is as yet unidentified, four of the works copied by him in this manuscript (though not L'Orfeo) conclude with a stylized signature: Oh che pena è la mia, H. 483 (f.34); La beltà ch'io sospiro, H. 353 (f. 134v); Io ben so che siete arciere, H.334 (f. 108v); and Lumi ch'in fronte al mio bel Sole, H. 402 (f. 118v).

In L'Orfeo, too, there are features that link the F-Pn source to Alessandro Scarlatti's notational practice, suggesting again that it is the work of a copyist with access to the composer's autograph material. One clue is in the text of the second strophe of Arias 2 and 3, which in F-Pn is given below the bass clef, just as Scarlatti does for example in D-MÜs 3987, in the cantata Lontananza, che fai?, H. 394, Aria 1 ("Ingegnoso il Dio d'Amore").¹² Another parallel with Scarlatti's notation is the barring of Aria 3 mainly in units of two measures of $\frac{3}{4}$, mixed with some single $\frac{3}{4}$ measures. This barring in triple meters including $\frac{3}{8}$, $\frac{3}{4}$, and $\frac{3}{2}$ —all prefixed commonly by c—is a recurrent characteristic of Scarlatti's notation in the autograph cantatas of D-MÜs 3987 and in other autograph manuscripts. In contrast, the copyist of D-MÜs 3931, known to Hanley as "Scribe A," habitually introduces some modifications of Scarlatti's notation: he writes out D. C. repetitions in full, and gives the strophic arias twice in full score, complete with D. C. His barring of arias in triple meter is the standard "modernized" treatment, as in Aria 3 in L'Orfeo. A number of vocal slurs not seen in F-Pn are given in D-MÜs, again a characteristic of this copyist's work, for example in his copy of Venere, Adone et Amore, Och 992, which has numerous vocal slurs indicating non-syllabic text setting, that are not given in the other sources and may thus be the addition of this copyist.¹³ Conclusive evidence of this practice of adding vocal slurs may be seen in comparing the autograph score of the cantata Quella pace gradita, H.610 (D-MÜs 864) with the parts copied by the same copyist (D-MÜs 3921): where Scarlatti gives no slurs, the copyist adds them consistently to two-note groups on one syllable in the vocal part.

All slurs in the vocal part appear in D-MÜs only. As argued above, there is a good chance that they are additions by this copyist, but they have been regarded as functional and as such not strictly “incorrect.” The presence of these vocal slurs indicates at a glance to the singer the general shape of the underlay of the text—the patterns of syllabic setting alternating with paired setting. In any case, the use of vocal slurs in this way seems to have been habitual for this copyist, who is among the most regularly represented in copies of Scarlatti’s works of all types from cantatas to oratorio.

¹² The strophic setting of this aria is the first of three alternate settings given in D-MÜs 3987. The cantata is dated "27 9bre 1701" in the autograph.

In summary, it can be said that the two sources of this work reflect some differences of layout and scribal tradition, but each is highly accurate in transmitting music and poetic text. It is arguable that both copyists were part of the circle authorized (or required) to copy Scarlatti’s music at, or close to, the time of this composition. Both sources have thus been taken into consideration in editing the work. Variant readings are reported in the Editorial Notes with the Pn reading in general given preference unless in case of an obvious scribal error.

While neither source is dated, it seems likely that the majority of the works by the copyist of L'Orfeo in F-Pn D.11857 were copied in 1704, though not necessarily composed in that year. Three of the works—each of them examples with the copyist’s signature—have the date 1704 at the top left of the opening page: Oh che pena è la mia, H.483; Io ben so che siete arciere, H.334; and Lumi ch'in fronte al mio bel Sole, H. 402, which incidentally is dated “4 Xbre 1703” in the compilation manuscript GB-Lbl Add. 29249. La beltà ch'io sospiro, H. 353, dates from the earliest years of the eighteenth century—either 1702 or 1701 as outlined above (fn.7). This copy of L'Orfeo, too, may date from 1704 if the works in F-Pn D.11857 by this copyist represent a single “batch” of copying.

Editorial Methods

The vocal part has been transposed in the edition from soprano (C1) clef to treble (G2) clef. Key signatures and time signatures are shown as in the manuscript sources.

In his basso continuo figuring, Scarlatti regularly indicates a major third with a sharp and minor third with a flat, regardless of key signature—a usage deriving from seventeenth-century practice. A diminished seventh is likewise signed as flat 7/5, though the flattened seventh may be F-natural or F-sharp. This earlier practice co-exists in many of Scarlatti’s autograph scores alongside the three-symbol system of sharp, flat, and natural, in which the natural cancels either a flat or a sharp in the key signature. The co-existence of these two systems is present in L'Orfeo, especially in the sharp keys based on the hard hexachord, such as F-sharp minor and C-sharp minor (i.e. a natural is used to express minor third on C-sharp or F sharp). In view of the consistency between the two sources in the bass figuring, this feature has been retained in the edition.

The edition retains the figured bass convention of Scarlatti and his copyists in indicating the cadential 4-3 without indicating #3. It was the practice of Scarlatti to give the cadential 4-3 in one stroke of the pen, assuming the leading note unless specifically contradicted by a flat or natural. The timing of cadence resolutions in recitative is a subject that may puzzle the less experienced performer, but it is a recurrent effect of Italian recitative phrase punctuation. For example, in Recitative 1, m. 34, the word 'a-ma-ta' (written e'-e'), is to be performed f#'-e' - i.e. with the customary appoggiatura convention required at the end of a vocal phrase notated as a falling third from the preceding note (g'). The vocal phrase is resolved here—as in several other passages throughout the cantata—on the weak (fourth) beat of the measure over dominant harmony, while the resolution of the cadence in the basso continuo does not come until the following downbeat. This effect is not described as a dissonance in contemporary texts, the most relevant being Francesco Gasparini, L'Armonico pratico al cimbalo, (Venice, 1708), who illustrates this type of cadence in an example drawing attention to an accentuated dissonance (augmented second).¹⁴

Scarlatti's habit of barring arias in triple meter mainly in units of two measures is reflected in the Pn source Aria 3, but not in D-MŪs 3931. The MŪs copyist's habit of changing the composer's barring to the regular single units of $\frac{3}{4}$, $\frac{3}{8}$, etc., is also seen in the parts he made for Quella pace gradita (D-MŪs 3921), copied almost certainly from the autograph. Comparison of the autograph and this copyist's parts of the same work also shows his habit of adding vocal slurs not present in the autograph, in passages where a syllable is set to pairs of eighth or sixteenth notes.

Instrumentation of the arias ranges from settings with two violins (Introduttione, Aria 1, and Aria 3), to unison violins (Arias 2, 4, and 5). In the latter case, the violin part is marked simply "Unisoni" or "Unis", while those with two violins are unmarked except Aria 3, which has unusually detailed markings as shown in the edition, expressed somewhat differently in the two sources. In both cases there is no doubt that no chordal continuo instrument is to play, both from the markings —"senza Cembalo" (F-Pn) and "Strom.[en]ti d'Arco" (D-MŪs), and from the absence of bass figures. Otherwise, there is ambiguity in the markings, which read "Violini e Violoncello soli" in F-Pn, and "Violini e Violoncello solo" (D-MŪs). The similarity of the expressions suggests that they both derive from the autograph; however the meaning of the phrase may indicate a group of solo violins and violoncello, or alternatively the "soli" may be used to exclude a sixteen-foot bowed instrument from an ensemble of more than one instrument to a part.

A similarly ambivalent use of "solo" arises in Aria 1, in which passages for Violin I are marked solo (e.g. m. 65, introducing the vocal entry; m. 77 (the opening of B section), and m. 85 (reprise of A). No corresponding solo markings are present in Violin II, nor are there "tutti" markings to cancel out the "solo." This seemingly incomplete indication is commonly seen in manuscripts of Scarlatti's cantatas and solo serenatas with violins; one possible interpretation is that the "solo" marking in Violin I is cautionary, indicating a change of texture to a single violin in dialogue with the voice.¹⁵ With this in mind, editorial "tutti" markings are not supplied, and this is an issue that must be addressed if the work is performed with more than one instrument to a part.

An issue of dotted rhythm notation arises in Arias 1 and 4: the same motivic figure is introduced with dotted patterns in the violin parts (Aria 1, m. 62 and throughout) but notated as even sixteenth notes in the vocal part, in both sources. It seems from the frequent occurrence of this feature in Scarlatti's autograph manuscripts that it cannot be a case of inattentive copying, but a convention understood by contemporary performers. In such arias, the composer clearly

The timing of cadences is discussed at length in Sven Hostrup Hansell, "The Cadence in 18th-Century Recitative", Musical Quarterly 54 (1968): 228–248. He demonstrates that the tendency to avoid the simultaneous sounding of vocal resolution and basso continuo on the dominant chord (i.e. by playing the cadence after the voice ends the phrase) comes into later eighteenth-century notation of cadential phrases. A useful more recent full discussion of this topic appears in Thomas Griffin (ed.), Alessandro Scarlatti, Erminia (Rome: Istituto Italiano per la Storia della Musica, 2011), Introduction, pp.xv–xxi.

¹⁵ See Marie-Louise Catsalis and Rosalind Halton (eds.) Alessandro Scarlatti, Solo Serenatas (Middleton, Wisconsin: A-R Editions, 2011), B175, xxvi–xxvii ("Musical Style and Performance") on the "solo/tutti" issue in the context of evidence for ensemble sizes in cantata and solo serenatas.

expected that the text, and the alternation of long and short syllables, would define the singer's response to the melodic material without being prompted by dotted notation, particularly after hearing the identical motivic patterns introduced by violins playing dotted rhythms.¹⁶ Aria 4 shows a similar situation, though more variety in the interpretation of sixteenth notes is implied with a mixture of dotted and undotted motives in the unison violin part: the voice does not imitate these violin motives, but is frequently linked to the rhythm of the violin part, either simultaneously (A section, mm. 267–68) or in dialogue (B section, mm. 273–76 and 282–84). In both arias, the rhythm of the vocal part is not modified in the edition.¹⁷

Acknowledgments

My warm thanks are due to staff of the Bibliothèque nationale de France, Paris and the Santini Sammlung of the Diözesan Bibliothek, Münster for invaluable assistance in supplying microfilm of the manuscript sources and granting permission to reproduce images. I would also like to thank the Research Committee of the University of New England, N.S.W., for financial support of this project from 1992–98, and the Research Management Branch of the University of Newcastle, for support from 2001–2005. The performance given at the University of Newcastle in June 2008 by Joelene Griffith (soprano), violinists Natalya Bing and Marina Hopcroft, and Jonathon Tosio (cello) played a vital part in preparation of this edition, and in our appreciation of the musical and dramatic thinking contained in the work. I warmly thank Barbara Sachs (Loro Ciuffenna, Arezzo) for her generous and expert assistance with the text and translation; Wesley Dunnagan, Senior, Stanford University, for checking and reporting watermark information on F-Pn D.11857 on a recent visit to the Bibliothèque nationale de France; the referees of the edition for their valuable comments; and above all WLSCM Associate Editor Janette Tilley for her tireless assistance in preparing the edition, and Editor-in-Chief Alexander Silbiger for invaluable encouragement and advice over many years.

¹⁶ The issue is discussed in John Byrt, “Elements of Rhythmic Inequality in the Arias of Alessandro Scarlatti and Handel,” Early Music 35 (2007): 609–26, and Rosalind Halton, “Correspondence: Rhythmic Inequality,” Early Music 36 (2008): 350–51, and John Byrt, “Inequality in Alessandro Scarlatti and Handel: a sequel,” Early Music 40 (2012): 91–110.

¹⁷ The excellent recording of “L'Orfeo” by soprano Elisabeth Scholl (Inferno: Cantate drammatiche, 2006, with Modo Antiquo, director Federico Maria Sardelli, CPO 777 141–42), illustrates an ideally flexible approach to the performance of these figures, in the spirit of “vocal inequality” advocated by John Byrt.

CRITICAL NOTES

Vocal range: c#' – g".

M. 1: Introduzione (F-Pn); Introduzione (D-MÜs).

Opening motive notated $\bar{\cdot}\bar{\cdot}$ in D-MÜs; F-Pn has $\flat\sharp$. This notation is maintained throughout F-Pn in all three parts.

M. 7, violin 1, beat 4: $\bar{\cdot}\bar{\cdot}$ in D-MÜs.

M. 12: violin 1 has $\flat\sharp$ in D-MÜs for the only time, though the reading without the rest appears in bass.

M. 14, violin 1: D-MÜs omits # to d", beat 3, but continuo gives #.

Figuring throughout the Introduzione is closely matched between the two sources.

Recit. 1.

Rec^o in D-MÜs. All Recitatives are marked Rec^o in D-MÜs; Recit. 3 only is labeled thus in F-Pn.

M. 51: “amante” (F-Pn); “amato” (D-MÜs).

Mm. 53–54: “poi che” (F-Pn); “per-che” (D-MÜs).

M. 57, bass, note 1: g (F-Pn).

Aria 1.

Adagio (F-Pn); Aria adagio/ ad^o (D-MÜs, tempo marking below each violin staff).

M. 72, dynamic markings are “pia” in F-Pn; “P⁰” in D-MÜs; both sources give the markings in violin 1, 2, and bass.

M. 76, D-MÜs with written out D.C. gives $\flat\sharp - \text{cresc.}$

Recit. 2

Rec^o. (D-MÜs only).

M. 87, “querelo?”: question mark only in F-Pn; question mark in both sources, m. 89, “son io?”

Aria 2

Aria/ allegro / all^o. (F-Pn, tempo marking below violin and above bass staves); Aria allegro (D-MÜs); Unis (F-Pn); Unisoni (D-MÜs).

Second strophe, text is written below bass staff in F-Pn; D-MÜs has the music written out twice. Edition follows the detailed differences in underlay from this source.

M. 117, violin, note 2: dynamic marking in D-MÜs only.

M. 130: dynamics in D-MÜs only (violin and bass).

M. 132: dynamic marking in D-MÜs only.

Recit.3

M. 182, voice: slur in D-MÜs only.

Aria 3

adagio below each violin staff (F-Pn); Aria / ad^o. tempo marking over violin 1 (D-MÜs).

$\frac{3}{4}$, barred in 2 x $\frac{3}{4}$ bar units. “Violini, e Violoncello soli” [before the staves]; “senza Cembalo” [below bass staff], adagio below both violin staves (F-Pn); cresc. , barred in $\frac{3}{4}$ units. “Strom.ti d'Arco/ Violini e Violoncello solo” (D-MÜs). No figures appear in either source.

Mm. 212, 219, 230–31: vocal slurs in D-MÜs only.

M. 214, violin 1, note 2: g' (D-MÜs).

M. 255: Dal Segno (F-Pn); D.C. is written out in full in D-MÜs, showing that the second strophe begins at m. 197 (i.e. omitting the introduction). No differences in underlay between the two strophes.

Aria 4

Aria/ Andante/ Unis^o. [Unisoni] (F-Pn and D-MÜs)

Throughout, three-note figures following a rest are notated with sixteenth rest and note, followed by dotted sixteenth and thirty-second. Assimilation of the dotted figure is recommended in performance, i.e. ♯♯.

Dynamic markings for violin unisoni are given as pia. in F-Pn, and P^o in D-MÜs.

M. 262, bass, note 5: flat missing (F-Pn only).

M. 263, bass, note 10: g (D-MÜs only).

M. 269, bass: dynamic marking on note 1 below staff (D-MÜs), but to note 2, below staff (F-Pn).

M. 271, violin: dynamic marking in F-Pn only.

M. 282, bass, note 2: G in F-Pn.

M. 283, beat 2: violin figure undotted sixteenths in F-Pn, dotted rhythm in D-MÜs.

D-MÜs has some more bass figures than F-Pn, mainly “♯” for thirds.

Aria 5

Unis^o. / Presto (F-Pn); Aria/Presto/ Unisoni (D-MÜs)

M. 326, violin: dynamic marking placed below beat 4 (F-Pn); below beats 3–4 (D-MÜs);

M. 329, violin: dynamic marking placed below note 4 (F-Pn); between notes 2 and 3 (D-MÜs).

TEXT AND TRANSLATION

L'Orfeo

Recit.

Dall'oscura magion dell'arsa Dite
 dell'estinta Euridice
 seco portava Orfeo l'ombra adorata.
 Ma l'amante infelice
 l'empia legge obliata
 che dal nume infernal gli fu prescritta, prima d'uscir dall'infocata soglia
 alla bell'ombra afflitta
 incauto volse l'amoroso sguardo;
 ed oh, con qual tormento, ah, con qual doglia
 sparir la vidde l'amoroso Trace.
 Quindi pronto ai lamenti al moto tardo, perduta la speranza
 di riveder mai più lo spirito amante lungi n'andò da la tartarea stanza;
 e poiché il crudo fato
 due volte gl'involò l'amato bene, così a sfogar ei prese
 del suo dolente cor l'acerbe pene.

From the dark dwelling of arid Hades Orfeo carried with him
 the adored shade of the dead Euridice.
 But the unhappy lover,
 having forgotten the wicked law prescribed by the infernal god,
 before departing from the blazing threshold incautiously turned his loving glance
 to the suffering beautiful shade;
 and oh, with what torment, alas, with what pain
 the loving Thracian saw her disappear!
 Thus prone to lament, with slow tread,
 having lost hope
 of ever seeing again the beloved spirit,
 he went far from the Tartarean region.
 And since cruel fate
 twice robbed him of his beloved,
 thus he began to express the fierce pain of his sorrowful heart.

Aria 1

“Chi m'invola la cara Euridice, chi l'alma dal core,
 chi il core dal sen?
 Se mirarla già più non mi lice,
 d'eterno dolore
 m'uccida il velen.

“Who robs me of my dear Euridice,
 who takes the soul from my heart,
 my heart from my breast?
 If I may not see her any more,
 may the poison of eternal pain kill me.

Recit. 2

“Ma di chi mi querelo,
 se delle mie sventure autor son io?
 Ah che l'ardente brama, il mio desio
 mentre anelante affretto
 per riveder le tue sembianze amate, consorte sventurata,
 mi diviser da te, l'alma dal petto.
 Oh più crudel di quante fur vicende,
 dolce occasione ingrata
 se amor mi noce e la pietà m'offende,

“But to whom do I protest,
 if I am the author of my own ill fortune?
 Ah that my impassioned yearning, my desire—while I hasten, gasping
 to see again your beloved face, unlucky consort—separated me
 from you, my soul from my breast.
 Oh, more cruel than how many past events this sweet thankless occasion
 if love hurts me and mercy offends me,

e mirando il mio bene in strane guise son più crudel dell'aspe che l'uccise.

and looking at my beloved in strange form,
I am more cruel than the snake that killed her.

Aria 2

1. “Se mirando, occhi perversi, tor la vita voi sapete,
gl'empi guardi in me conversi perché ancor non m'uccidete?”

1. “If by looking, perverse eyes,
you know how to take a life,
why don't you kill me as well, turning those evil glances on myself?”

2. Meco voi pietosi tanto
vedo ben ch'esser non lice, che saria pietoso vanto
dar la morte a un infelice.

2. I see indeed that it is not granted that you show me such pity,
for it would be a mark of mercy
to give death to one in misery.

Recit. 3

“Or poiché mi tradir gl'occhi tiranni, Voi, labra mie canore,
col musico valore
al dolce suon de la concorde Lira, Voi raddolcite i miei crudeli affanni.

“Since my tyrannous eyes betrayed me,
you, my singing lips,
with your musical power
to the sweet sound of the harmonious lyre,
you sweeten my cruel sufferings.

Aria 3

1. “Sordo il tronco, e grave il sasso

corse al suon de' dolci carmi.
Fermò il passo
belva rigida e feroce;
l'onda lubrica e veloce
giacque immota ad ascoltar mi.

1. “The unhearing tree, and the heavy rock
moved to the sound of sweet songs.
The cruel and fierce beast
halted its step;
the swift and sliding wave
remained motionless to hear me.

2. Lasciò Cerbero i latrati in sentir le voci ignote.
De' dannati
cessò il pianto, e il duolo eterno;
si placò tutto l'inferno
al tenor de le mie note.

2. Cerberus left off his barking on hearing the unfamiliar strains.
The weeping and eternal pain
of the damned ceased;
all hell was calmed
at the sound of my notes.

Recit. 4

“Ah, voi m'abbandonate, musicisti spirti, e indarno
chiedo da voi le meraviglie usate.

“Ah, you abandon me,
spirits of music, and in vain
I ask of you your customary miracles.

Aria 4

“Il vanto del canto
mi toglie il dolor.
La pena raffrena
gl'accenti potenti
e atroce la voce
mi chiude nel cor.”

“The pride of singing
takes away my suffering.
Pain checks
my potent accents
and cruelly, it fixes the voice
within my heart.”

Recit. 5

Così dicendo, il gran cantor dell'Ebro
tornar volea di Pluto al cieco regno, ma a l'ardito disegno
crudel s'oppose e ai musici lamenti sordo il nocchier de le perdute genti.
Filli, tu che pietosa
ascoltasti d'Orfeo
l'istoria lagrimosa,
che per un sguardo d'ogni suo ben fu privo,
perché non hai pietà de' danni miei s'ancor io per mirarti il cor perdei?

Thus saying, the great singer of the Ebrus wished to return to the dark kingdom of Pluto
but the boatman of the lost people,
deaf to his musical laments,
cruelly opposed the bold plan.
Filli, you who have listened sympathetically to the lamentable tale of Orpheus, who for one glance
was deprived of all his blessings, why don't you take pity on my woes
since I too lost my heart by looking at you?

Aria 5

Sì, pietà de' miei martiri,
habbi, o Cara, un sol momento.
Le mie voci, il dolor mio,
gl'amorosi miei sospiri
fan palese il mio desio
e desio morir contento.

Yes, have mercy on my suffering,
oh beloved, for a single moment.
My words, my pain,
my loving sighs
declare my desire,
and I desire to die happy.
