This edition was produced with free and open-source software on Fedora and Debian Linux operating systems. The text was typeset with the L<sup>A</sup>T<sub>E</sub>X document-preparation system, based on the work of Donald Knuth and Leslie Lamport. The music was typeset with Lilypond, version 2.19, created by Han-Wen Nienhuys and Jan Niewenhuizen. I am grateful to the hundreds of volunteers who build and maintain these systems, and to those who provided specific help in programming this document.

The text typeface is EB Garamond, designed by Georg Duffner, based on 1592 type specimens by Claude Garamont. The Spanish CZ metrical symbol used in the scores was traced manually by the editor in Inkscape from a villancico manuscript by Miguel de Irízar.

Ellen Hargis of the Newberry Consort identified several errors and colleagues raised concerns about some terminology.

1. Introduction
  - Surname Gutiérrez de Padilla used instead of just Padilla (The manuscripts refer to the composer as “Maestro Padilla,” but the full surname is now standard in Spanish musicology)
  - Term “Hispanic” replaced with alternatives (The term was meant as “in the cultural world of Spanish-speaking people, not just in Spain,” but some readers perceived it as an ethnic or racial term)
2. Gutiérrez de Padilla, Al establo más dichoso (poem)
  - Accent: Papalotillo, l. 13
  - Translation: Papalotillo, l. 88: Labrador is farm owner, not laborer (Thank you to Prof. Pablo Sierra of the University of Rochester for this insight.)

INTRODUCTION

At the height of the Spanish Empire in the seventeenth century, villancicos were one of the most widespread forms of religious expression and a central part of social life.<sup>1</sup> These musical performances of poems in vernacular languages (usually Spanish or Portuguese) celebrated common Catholic beliefs, popular customs, and modes of devotion through metaphorical conceits both earthy and ingenious. A few villancico poets are known by name from published collections, like Vicente Sánchez (author of two villancicos in this edition), Manuel de León Marchante, and Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz. Most villancico poems in musical settings, though, are anonymous, and many were probably adapted and reworked by the composers themselves. In the form of printed leaflets of the poetry (pliegos sueltos) and in manuscript performing parts of the music they were passed from hand to hand across oceans in a global network of affiliated musicians and members of the literate elite.<sup>2</sup>

The musical settings of these poems occupied the energies of every major chapelmaster and his ensemble on all the highest feast days of the year. Though the genre originated as a form of courtly entertainment, by the beginning of the seventeenth century most villancicos were sacred both in their themes and in the venues and occasions of their performance. Sacred villancicos were often composed in sets of eight so that they could be interspersed after or in place of the Responsory chants of the Matins liturgy, especially at Christmas and Corpus Christi.<sup>3</sup> Villancicos were also performed in church for Mass and services of Eucharistic devotion, and outside of church in Corpus Christi processions and mystery plays (autos sacramentales).

Though many of the sources have been lost, the surviving repertoire is vast and rich, encompassing a broad range of devotional life across the Spanish world. Villancicos present a wide range of formal structures, but most feature an estribillo, a motet-like section for the full ensemble, and coplas, strophic verses often scored for soloists or a reduced ensemble. Many of the sources specify that the estribillo was repeated after the coplas. Villancicos of this period were often scored for large polychoral ensembles of voices, probably doubled by loud wind instruments and supported by organ, harp, and other plucked strings. Others, sometimes called tonos divinos, are scored for a more intimate texture of a few voices with continuo. The first type are public, festival pieces; the second offer more private, contemplative experiences. With a variety of subgenres and topics from the comic to the learned, there was a villancico for everyone and nearly every occasion.

This edition offers performers and scholars a coherent set of newly edited villancicos, drawn from archives in Spain and Mexico, that share a common theme of “singing about singing.”<sup>4</sup> The poetry of these

4. My dissertation, Andrew A. Cashner, “Faith, Hearing, and the Power of Music in Hispanic Villancicos, 1600–1700” (PhD diss., University of Chicago, 2015), analyzes and interprets these villancicos in the context of contemporary theological “metamusical” pieces represents the act of hearing and making music. The musical settings of these poems, then, become discourses about music, through the medium of music itself. The thematic organization makes these pieces ideal both for concert programming and for scholarly research and teaching.

Interpretive Themes

The villancicos in this collection present a complex and multilayered discourse of music and theology. Common tropes run through these pieces and manifest traditions of poetry and music about musical performance, or about music as an abstract concept. The pieces embody a Neoplatonic theology of music in which listeners are invited to listen for echoes of higher music in the imperfect earthly music they hear.<sup>5</sup> The following brief interpretive notes may serve as an initial guide to understanding these pieces.

Cererols and Gutiérrez de Padilla: Christ as Singer and Song

The first two pieces, Suspended, cielos, vuestro dulce canto by Joan Cererols and Vóces, las de la capilla by Juan Gutiérrez de Padilla, are villancicos for Christmas that represent the newborn Christ as both singer and song.<sup>6</sup> Extending on an exegetical tradition going back to Bernard of Clairvaux and Augustine, these pieces celebrate Christ as the Verbum infans, the Word of God made flesh (John 1:1), but as an infant, unable to speak a word. Since Christ in his incarnate body is himself the Word, these pieces portray his inarticulate cries as a form of music, as the tuning note—the “sign of A (la, mi, re)”—to which the music of a renewed creation will be harmonized. Joan Cererols, monk and chapelmaster of the choir school of the Benedictine Abbey of Our Lady of Montserrat near Barcelona, has his ensemble bid the heavenly spheres themselves to cease their imperfect music and “listen to the newest consonance” of Christ. Juan Gutiérrez de Padilla, priest and chapelmaster of Puebla Cathedral in New Spain (Mexico), presents Christ as the heir of the musician-king David, the masterpiece of the divine chapelmaster who puts God and Man in harmony through his Incarnate body, which is made known through his infant voice.

The composers match the musical conceits of the poetry with the appropriate musical devices, such as the eight-voice fugue in strict counterpoint in late sixteenth-century style (like that of Palestrina, Morales, and Guerrero) that Cererols creates for contrapunto celestial. Cererols even illustrates the idea of Christ as the cantus firmus for a restored heavenly music by developing the motive of a descending stepwise fifth throughout the estribillo, culminating in a concluding section in the style of a cantus-firmus motet. Cererols illustrates “the newest consonance” by setting the word consonancia on a prominent, unprepared, and repeated dissonance. By drawing listeners’ attention to the imperfection of worldly music through this ironic symbol, Cererols points them in Neoplatonic fashion past the sounding music, to listen for an unhearable, higher music of Christ the divine Word.

Gutiérrez de Padilla also creates musical devices to illustrate the arcane music-theoretical and theological references in his poem. He quotes the plainchant tonus peregrinus on the words peregrino tono. The chapelmaster has half his ensemble exhort the other half to “keep count with what is sung” while they are literally counting their rests. Then the other chorus sings about “awaiting the thirty-three” (a reference to Christ’s Passion) with exactly thirty-three notes. Both choirs join together to represent the celebration of heavenly beings, humans, and beasts singing in the manger, in the style of a madrigal, scored for voices literature. This edition corrects and supersedes the musical editions in the dissertation.

“three by three, two by two, one by one.” The estribillo climaxes with an epitome of Catholic belief about Christ’s Incarnation, “Everything in man is to ascend, and everything in God is to descend.” Gutiérrez de Padilla sets the first line to an ascending line in normal triple meter and juxtaposes this against the second phrase, which he sets as a long descending line in sesquialtera (hemiola), written using all blackened noteheads. Thus the theological and musical are closely linked in both pieces, so that one’s knowledge of theology informs understanding of the musical structure, and one’s knowledge of music theory and ability to perceive musical-rhetorical devices gives insight into theological conceptions of Incarnation, voice, and hearing.

Irízar, Carrión, Cáceda: Hearing and Faith

Next are two settings of the villancico poem, Si los sentidos queja forman del Pan Divino, by successive chapelmasters at Segovia Cathedral in the later seventeenth century.<sup>7</sup> The poem, attributed to Vicente Sánchez of Zaragoza, presents a contest of the senses, to be judged by their merits in relationship to faith. The contest is similar to the one in Pedro Calderón de la Barca’s Corpus Christi play El nuevo palacio del Retiro of 1634.<sup>8</sup> The coplas articulate commonly held beliefs about the powers of the senses and emphasize that the mystery of the Eucharist confounds every sense. Hearing is given the first prize because only through believing in what is heard, and not through the other senses, can one rightly perceive Christ’s presence in the sacrament. The poem uses music to exemplify the sense of hearing. Irízar’s festival setting evokes the contest musically through polychoral dialogue and perhaps evoking the keyboard genre of batalla. Carrión’s continuo song, by contrast, invites a more personal reflection on the nature of sensation.

José de Cáceda’s setting of Qué música divina intersects both with the metamusical conceits of the pieces by Gutiérrez de Padilla and Cererols and with the discourse on sensation in the Irízar and Carrión villancicos. The central conceit of this piece for Eucharistic devotion presents Christ in his Passion as a vihuela.<sup>9</sup> The poem applies patristic allegorical traditions of the cithara and lira to a distinctly Spanish instrument. The music played on this instrument is “not for the senses”; it “elevates the senses” and “confounds the mind’s powers.”<sup>10</sup> If it could be heard it would sound “false”—dissonant, out of tune, or as musica ficta. Similar to Cererols evoking divine consonance through earthly dissonance, Cáceda appears to employ deliberate solecisms to represent this “false” music, like the parallel fifths and direct octaves on the word “tuneful,” or the cadential patterns on “various cadences” that tempt singers to add accidentals in the wrong places. He evokes the seven-course vihuela in several ways through the vocal texture, most notably through the strumming texture at the end of the estribillo.

Though Cáceda lived and worked in Zaragoza, this piece survives only in the collection of the Conceptionist Convento de la Santísima Trinidad in Puebla.<sup>11</sup> In performing this piece, the chorus of nuns whose names are preserved in the parts would in a sense become a vihuela, embodying an instrument while presenting that instrument as a symbol of Christ’s body.

This piece demonstrates a strain of villancico composition quite removed from the popularizing, folkloric types of villancicos that have become better known, such as the pieces that follow in this edition.

Instead this is an exercise in contemplative devotion worked out through a musical craft that emphasizes both ingenuity and affective power.

Gutiérrez de Padilla and Salazar: Singing in Christ's Stable

The last two pieces in this edition return to the stable in Bethlehem to unite humans and angels in the music of Christ's Incarnation. In a piece for the new cathedral of Puebla (consecrated three years earlier in 1649), Juan Gutiérrez de Padilla and his ensemble call up a colorful host of characters “to the most blessed stable” to sing and dance for the baby Jesus.<sup>12</sup> This ensaladilla is a potpourri of different song and dance styles, probably referencing pre-existing music known to the hearers. A group of shepherds sing something called the “New Trojan” to the music of “tempered panpipes.” A buffoon mule Skinner’s mule barges into the stable in search of straw; the befuddled candy vendor tries to excuse himself before the Christ-child, whom he obsequiously calls “Sir Baby,” while struggling to control his mule—a struggle evoked through disorderly rhythm. Next a group of “mountain folk,” whose language marks them as agricultural laborers, dances a gentle “Papalotillo.” This name is derived from a Nahuatl word, and these characters may be meant to represent indigenous people.

The final section of the piece is a complete, self-contained negrilla or “black villancico,” a common subgenre. Here Gutiérrez de Padilla’s ensemble of Spaniards and Spaniard-descended criollos presented caricatures of Africans and their music, in a mocking imitation of African speech. In the midst of a pseudo-African dance, the black characters are suddenly joined by a chorus of angels in singing Gloria—but the blacks sing in the ternary meter typical of villancicos while the angels sing in the duple meter more commonly used for Latin-texted liturgical music, and evoke a plainchant intonation.

Gutiérrez de Padilla’s “little salad” tosses together characters from different racial and economic strata to present an idealistic vision of the whole colonial society united around the body of Christ. This composer, who was both a university-educated priest and a slave-owner,<sup>13</sup> brings the highest and lowest beings together in harmony while paradoxically keeping them apart, reflecting a Neoplatonic concept of the social hierarchy.<sup>14</sup> While this piece and other “ethnic villancicos” have much to teach about how Spanish elites perceived their relationships to the other groups under their control, performers should consider seriously how it might be possible to present such a piece today in an ethically responsible manner.<sup>15</sup>

The last piece in the collection is a typical representation of angelic music at Christmas, by Antonio de Salazar, who became chapelmastor of Mexico City Cathedral.<sup>16</sup> This delicate villancico, with its lilting rhythms, is from the same convent collection as the Cáceda piece, in Puebla de los Ángeles, the original “city of the angels.” Salazar uses imitative counterpoint to represent the angelic chorus coming down to earth, much as Cererols did in his celestial fugue. The convent sisters who sang this piece at Christmas embodied and incited the affects that theologians considered most characteristic of this feast—wonder and joy.

Performance Suggestions

Spanish Pronunciation

Spanish-speaking ensembles should feel free to pronounce the Spanish according to their own accent. Other ensembles are encouraged to work with local native speakers and experts whenever possible to shape their pronunciation and understanding, so that they can perform these pieces in a way that Spanish-speaking audience members will understand and recognize as a part of their own cultural heritage.

Instrumentation and Voicing

These villancicos are scored for an ensemble of voices with instrumental bass or continuo groups. Vocal ensembles varied in size, from one-to-a-part groups to much larger polychoral forces. Most of the pieces also feature prominent solo parts, particularly in the coplas.

The lowest voice parts in these pieces are meant to be performed on instruments. They are only provided with short incipits of the text to orient the performer, and in several cases instruments like bajón (dulcian, bass curtal) or organ are specified. Though there is need for more research into the specific instrumentation of Spanish musical ensembles, it is plausible that the bass line was performed in most cases by a continuo group of bajón doubled by harp, organ, and possibly other instruments like the vihuela de mano.<sup>17</sup> In pieces without figured bass, continuo players—which could include any polyphonic instruments like keyboard or plucked strings—likely improvised harmonies to match the other voices.

The upper voices could have been doubled on bajoncillos, chirimías (shawms), sacabuches (sackbutts), and other instruments according to local resources and suited to the occasion. There is as yet no clear evidence, though, that church ensembles of seventeenth-century Spain or Spanish America included percussion instruments when performing in the liturgy.<sup>18</sup>

Ensembles should not be deterred by the lack of early instruments or by vocal ranges outside their resources. It would be entirely within the spirit of the performing traditions that these sources represent, for a school or community chorus to substitute modern instruments for their historic relatives. At a minimum, it is appropriate to use any keyboard, preferably with bassoon or cello, for the continuo, and bassoon or cello for the instrumental bass lines. If more instruments are available, a small organ (or a good digital sample of an 8' flue-type stop), harp, and classical guitar could be added to the continuo section. Vocal parts could be doubled with bassoons, oboes, trombones, or any other available instruments.

If possible, it would be appropriate to use soloists or a reduced ensemble for the first chorus in polychoral pieces, and for the coplas. In this way a chorus of more modest ability, such as a high school choir, could be paired with more advanced soloists, such as college students or adult community members.

17. On the changing instrumentation in one Spanish institution, see Álvaro Torrente, “The Sacred Villancico in Early Eighteenth-Century Spain: The Repertory of Salamanca Cathedral” (PhD diss., University of Cambridge, 1997).

18. For a critique of exoticizing practices in recent villancico performances, see Baker, “Latin American Baroque”; Drew Edward Davies, “Finding ‘Local Content’ in the Music of New Spain,” Early Music America 2, no. 19 (2013): 60–64.

If there are more instrumentalists than singers, there should be at least one singing voice per chorus to present the text. Instrumental parts and continuo realizations are available from the editor upon request.

Pitch Level

In encountering Spanish choral music of this period, musicians more familiar with other repertoires may be surprised by how high the vocal ranges are. Many of the Tiple (treble) parts have tessituras above f'', and none of the pieces have texted bass parts, these parts being played instrumentally instead. Either Spanish ensembles performed these pieces at a lower pitch level than notated (because of a lower general pitch, or through transposition), or Spain cultivated a lost art of angelically high singing.<sup>19</sup> Modern ensembles should sing the pieces at a pitch level or transposition that works for them. In addition to the two transposed scores already included, other transpositions are available from the editor upon request.

Rhythm, Meter, and Tempo

The meters and barlines in the edition are only conveniences to make the pieces plainly legible and performable. Performers should not always take the barlines as guides to accentuation, nor should they assume the music lacks natural accentuation. Mensural meters do not necessarily imply any particular pattern of rhythmic accentuation. Most of the time poetic declamation should be the primary guide for pacing and emphasis. In other cases, when a set style of dance or song seems to be evoked, a regular rhythmic pattern may win out over poetic nuances. Regarding such rhythmic patterns, it should be noted that no one has yet provided conclusive evidence for the presence of African or American indigenous rhythms in villancicos.

The sign C indicates a duple meter that should be felt “in two.” The sign C3 indicates a ternary meter that should be felt “in one.” Often triple meter is syncopated or altered by hemiola (also called sesquialtera) to create patterns of accentuation that differ from the normal ternary groupings indicated by the barlines. In José de Cáseda’s Qué música divina, for example, after shifting to C3, the composer makes novel use of sesquialtera. Starting in m. 19 Cáseda creates a sustained pattern of stresses in groups of three imperfect semibreves, such that the music could be rebarred in modern  $\frac{3}{4}$ .

In most cases, it seems appropriate to maintain a tempo relationship of three minims (half notes) in C3 to one minim (half note) in C. By maintaining this tempo relationship it is usually possible to maintain a consistent pulse throughout the whole piece. A resting heart rate of about sixty beats per minute generally makes a good tempo, such that in C,  $\text{J} = 60$ ; while in C3,  $\text{o.} = 60$  and  $\text{J} = 180$ .

Authenticity and Flexibility

In the editor’s opinion, an authentic performance of a seventeenth-century villancico would be one that is not only meaningful to present-day performers and their audience, but that also opens a window to experiencing what made the piece meaningful to its original performers and hearers. Performers should seek out the distinctive character and significance of each piece, but should also feel free to adapt the pieces to suit their own resources and social context. It would be better to have a spirited, respectful, musically sensitive performance with modern instruments, for example, than to have no performance at all because historic instruments were not available.

The sources for this edition are performing parts that, on the one hand, were used as practical tools for performance in a particular place, and, on the other hand, represent traditions of performance that cannot be completely fixed in place or time. Even within one institution, such as the Conceptionist convent in Puebla from which come the parts for Salazar's Ángelicos coros and Cáseda's Qué música divina, these parts were used and reused possibly over generations. In some cases, later performers made corrections, added barlines, sewed in new lines of lyrics or even new music to replace certain strophes. There is no single way that these pieces were performed throughout their terms of service as part of the local repertoire.

Moreover, these pieces represent single instances of a repertoire that circulated around the globe. José de Cáseda lived in Zaragoza and set a text by a poet from his same region, Vicente Sánchez; but this setting is only known from the surviving parts in the Puebla convent. The spelling in those parts reflects New Spanish, not Zaragozan pronunciation.<sup>20</sup> The piece may have been rearranged or adapted for female ensemble from a lost original with different scoring. On some occasions, a particular sister may have fallen ill and her vocal line may have been played instrumentally.

Historic performers made these pieces their own and performed them in a way that fit their local needs in terms of personnel, instrumentation, acoustic space, and other factors. They performed these pieces in a way that was intelligible and meaningful to them and to their hearers. Modern performers are continuing in the same spirit when they make practical adaptations for their circumstances.

Ethical Responsibility

While some amount of adaptation seems appropriate for this repertoire, performers are urged never to lose sight of the religious, social, and political contexts of these pieces in their early modern origins. These villancicos are all devotional pieces, used at some point in liturgical worship, but they do not fit easily into modern notions of sacred and profane, and embody both “piety and play.”<sup>21</sup> If we perform villancicos with too much solemnity, listeners may miss the elements of fun and virtuosity; but if we perform them too flippantly, the audience may fail to recognize them as expressions of human spirituality and ingenuity.

These pieces cannot be cleanly separated from the social values of the colonial era that this music both reflected and reinforced. A piece like Juan Gutiérrez de Padilla's Al establo más dichoso bears the imprint of imperial Spain's racial hierarchy. It is documented that the composer himself owned an Angolan slave,<sup>22</sup> and the representation of “Angolans” in the piece caricatures their bodies and voices as deformed and deficient, even as it perhaps strives to present them in a sympathetic light as offering devotion to Christ and joining with the angelic chorus. As Geoffrey Baker has argued, it would be ethically irresponsible to perform such a piece merely as an exotic curiosity, or worse, as though it were a twenty-first century celebration of ethnic diversity.<sup>23</sup>

Indeed, performers, scholars, and community members ought to engage in serious discussions about what performing such a piece might mean in a contemporary context. In the right setting, such as a community workshop with appropriate opportunities for critique, response, and discussion, the piece might be used effectively to raise issues of great contemporary relevance. In the wrong context, though, the piece could actually perpetuate the negative racial stereotypes that are built into it.

20. For example, consonancias is spelled consonansias in the Puebla parts, even though Cáseda's ensemble in Zaragoza probably used a sound like English TH for the final C.

Editorial Policies

Sources

The sources for each poem and its musical setting are listed in the critical notes. Select images of the sources are included in their own section below. The music is preserved in individual manuscript performing parts in looseleaf sets or bound partbooks. For the villancico by Miguel de Irízar, the composer's draft score also survives.

The texts and translations are based on the poetic text in the musical settings. They have been annotated and sometimes corrected in comparision with the surviving poetry imprints of the same or related villancico poems. The poems are generally anonymous but are often adapted from existing poems or poetic types.

The manuscript parts were practical tools for performers. They all bear evidence of frequent use over a long period: they are soiled along the creases in the paper where performers held them up, and they include the names of multiple performers, corrections in different hands, and added accidentals and barlines. Aspects of notation that seem ambiguous to a modern scholar were not, apparently, impediments to effective performance from the originals. The goal of this edition, in keeping with the nature of its sources, is to enable the practical performance and study of these villancicos through a clear and consistent notation.

Orthography

Spelling and punctuation have been modernized and standardized. Though in doing this some information about historic local pronunciation is lost, a standard orthography allows performers to present the works in a way that will be most intelligible to their audiences.<sup>24</sup> The exception to this rule is in the negrilla of Gutiérrez de Padilla's Al estable más dichoso, in which it seemed more responsible to present the pseudo-African dialect in its original orthography. Possible equivalents in proper Spanish are given in the footnotes.

Translations

The villancico poems in this edition are complex examples of the Spanish literary technique of conceptismo, in which the poem is governed by a central conceit that links two (or more) ideas together in an extended metaphor.<sup>25</sup> In these poems, music forms one side of the conceit, and a theological concept like Christ's Incarnation or Passion forms the other side, though this is an oversimplification. The wording of the Spanish is deliberately ambiguous so that one can read the poems concentrating on either or both sides of the metaphor. This means that it nearly impossible to translate the poetry into English and preserve the delicate balance of double and sometimes triple meanings. For Spanish words with two meanings, English equivalents with a similar range of meaning were chosen; but in other cases multiple alternatives had to be provided. The translations are as literal as possible while still conveying at least one level of the original sense. In some cases, the meaning of a cryptic phrase only becomes clear when read in the context of contemporary theological and devotional literature. Perplexed readers are urged to consult the

24. The phonetic orthography in the performing parts does suggest that ci and ce were pronounced like si and se in New Spain and Catalonia, rather than with the TH sound in modern peninsular Spanish (as in thick).

detailed exegesis of these poems in the editor's dissertation, as the translations are based on rigorous textual criticism and historically grounded contextual interpretation.

Voice and Instruments

The original names for voices and instruments have been preserved (though spelling has been standardized, so Baxo is rendered as Bajo). Tiple refers to a treble singer, usually a boy. Several terms are used for continuo parts, such as Acompañamiento, General, or Guion. The edition preserves indications of solo and instrumental parts when they appear in the original. Original figured bass is preserved, but continuo realizations are left to the discretion and creativity of the performer. Separate instrumental parts and realized keyboard parts are available on request from the editor.

Editorial Text

Italic text indicates editorial underlay, usually where there are signs (‰) in the sources that specify that the preceding text should be repeated. Other textual additions by the editor, such as standardized section headings, are enclosed in square brackets.

Pitch Level

All pieces are transcribed at their original notated pitch level. The preparatory staves at the beginning of each piece show the original clefs, signatures, and the first note. Two pieces, Suspended, cielos by Joan Cererols, and Qué música divina by José de Cáseda, are also provided in transposed editions that may be more practical for modern ensembles.

Accidentals

Accidental placement in the partbooks is contextual and sometimes ambiguous to a modern reader. The original notation has no ♯ symbol, using B♯ and E♯ instead. In a few cases, indicated in the critical notes, scribes use a ♯ sign as a cautionary accidental. One common use was to warn the singer not to apply a sharp according to musica ficta conventions.<sup>26</sup>

The edition presents the pitches with their accidental inflections when unambiguously specified in at least one source. According to modern convention, these accidentals are valid until the next barline. Thus repeated accidentals in the source are omitted if the modern convention does not require them; and in a few cases accidentals are added where modern notation demands. Editorial suggestions for other accidentals, mostly according to musica ficta conventions, are set above the staff.

Repeats

Some of the sources indicate repeated sections by using barlines with dots (like modern repeats), or by giving the incipit of the music and text to be repeated; often there is also a signum congruentiae at the point of repetition or a textual note. In most cases, the estribillo was reprised after the last copla was sung (like the respond in a Responsory chant). Some pieces call for a reprise after each copla or after certain groups of coplas. In many sources, the repeat of the estribillo is not specified, and it is possible that it was not always reprised, especially as villancicos became longer and more complex.<sup>27</sup> This edition uses modern repeat barlines for short repeated sections and indications of “D.C. al Fine” or “D.S. al Fine” with the § symbol, though these Italian texts are not used in the originals.

Rhythm, Meter, Tempo

The original music was written in mensural notation, with few barlines in the performing parts.<sup>28</sup> The duple-meter sections of these pieces were written in C meter, which the seventeenth-century Spanish theorists Pedro Cerone and Andrés Lorente refer to as tiempo menor imperfecto or compasillo.<sup>29</sup> In this meter, the compás or tactus consisted of a semibreve divided into two minims.<sup>30</sup>

The other common meter for seventeenth-century villancicos was notated with the symbol , a cursive CZ. Lorente says that this is a shorthand for C<sup>2</sup> or C3, where these signs all indicate tiempo menor de proporción menor, a proportion of C meter.<sup>31</sup> The compás consists of one perfect semibreve (o.), which is divided into three minims (d d d), instead of the two minims of C (d d).

In the sources, deviations from the normal ternary groups are indicated through coloration. When noteheads in C3 meter are blackened, this often indicates a shift to sesquialtera or hemiola. In sesquialtera two groups of three minims are exchanged for three groups of two minims; and three imperfect semibreves take the place of two perfect semibreves.

The edition presents the rhythms of the sources according to modern conventions of meter and barlines. The music has been notated in C for duple meter and C3 for triple meter. The original meter signs are shown in preparatory staves or above the staff. The original note values have not been reduced. Mensural coloration is indicated with short rectangular brackets above the staff. Ligatures are indicated by long rectangular brackets. Beaming is unchanged.

Regarding tempo, the theoretical 3 : 2 proportion of minims between C<sup>2</sup> and C does not necessarily imply the same proportion of tempo. In actual practice, a 3 : 1 tempo relationship often makes more musical sense, so that three minims in triple meter together take the same amount of time as one minim in duple meter. Thus two compases of CZ would have about the same duration as one compás of C.

28. Spanish composers like Miguel de Irízar did use barlines when they notated in score format. Irízar writes two compases per bar in both triple and duple meters, occasionally squeezing in a third compás for an odd number of groups. Cerone advises students who wish to write out a score from parts to write barlines every two compases; Cerone (El melopeo y maestro, 745).

Joan Cererols (1618–1680) was a monk at the Benedictine Abbey of Our Lady of Montserrat, a pilgrimage site at the top of a mountain north of Barcelona and home of Europe’s oldest continually established singing school for boys, the Escolania de Montserrat.<sup>32</sup> Joan Pau Cererols Fornell was baptized in 1618 in the nearby village of Martorell, the youngest child of Jaume Cererols, a tailor. His mother died when he was ten, and only a few months later Joan entered the boarding school as a chorister at the Escolania. He entered the novitiate of the Monsterrat Benedictines at age 18, in 1636, and remained at the monastery until his death in 1680. He served for many years as chapelmaster of the Escola (the choir of boys and men), teacher in the Escolania, and sacristan of the abbey church. According to a monastery chronicle, Cererols was also an excellent poet and theologian, and his pupils included distinguished chapelmasters and organists throughout Catalonia and the rest of Spain.

This critical edition is based on two manuscript sources of this villancico, CAN and Bbc, the latter previously unknown. It should supersede the earlier edition by David Pujols, which was based on CAN only and included some errors. Most critically, MEM mistakenly omits the breve rest in this edition’s measure 39, thus shifting the Alto fugue entrance one bar earlier through m. 47. This edition is not only based on an additional manuscript source but also improves on the earlier Montserrat edition by indicating editorial additions and mensural coloration, correcting text underlay, and including the manuscript’s figured bass.

<sup>32.</sup> Cashner, “Faith, Hearing, and the Power of Music,” 227–284. This biographical sketch is based on Grigori Estrada, “Esbós per a un estudi de l’obra de Joan Cererols (1618–1680),” in Joan Cererols i el seu temps: Actes del I Symposium de Musicologia Catalana, ed. Francesc Bonastre (Barcelona: Institut d’Estudis Catalans, 1985), 7–23; Ferran Balanza i González, “Joan Cererols (1618–1680): L’entorn familiar; Regest dels documents de l’Arxiu Parroquial de Martorell; Notes inèdites obre Gabriel Manalt i Domènech (1657–1687),” in Bonastre, Joan Cererols i el seu temps, 25–75.

The two manuscript sources present minor variants of the same piece of music. Both sources are probably copies based with some degree of separation on an original exemplar by Cererols at the Abbey of Montserrat. The original was most likely lost when the abbey library burned in the nineteenth century.

Only CAN includes all the voice parts and the coplas, and thus it is the primary source for this edition (Figure 1).<sup>33</sup> In comparing the parts that survive in both versions, there are only a few significant differences in Bbc:

1. One phrase of text is changed to make the piece fit a Eucharistic dedication. The text of CAN makes more sense as a Christmas piece, despite the dedication to the Blessed Sacrament on the cover leaf of the group of partbooks.
2. The highest voice part has a different final phrase in the estribillo.
3. Bbc includes the performance instructions eco and falso.
4. Bbc differs in the use of accidentals on C, F, and B; in most cases it is more explicit, writing out accidentals in situations where musica ficta practice would suggest them anyway.

This edition primarily follows CAN but does include the dynamic markings from Bbc in parentheses. Bbc writes out more accidentals explicitly, clarifying the usage of musica ficta.

Related Sources

This villancico is the only complete musical setting yet found of one of the most popular villancico poems of the seventeenth century. The poem as set by Cererols is one variant of a textual tradition extending back as early as a Royal Chapel performance in 1651.<sup>34</sup> A distinct branch of later variant versions may be traced to the work of Manuel de León Marchante from 1675.

This family of villancico poems is attested in the following imprints:

1651	Madrid	E-Mn: R/34199/27
1668	Calatayud	GB-Lbl: II450.dd.8 (54)
1675	Alcalá	Reprinted in Marchante, Obras poéticas (Madrid, 1733), 139
1680	Seville	E-Mn: VE/83/10
1681	Seville	E-Mn: VE/79/7
1683	Zaragoza	E-Mn: VE/129/2, GB-Lbl: I073.k.22 (07)
1689	Madrid	E-Mn: VE/88/80

Cererols's text incorporates aspects of both the early Royal Chapel tradition and the versions influenced by Marchante. In a few passages, indicated in the notes below, the text of the coplas in the Canet manuscript departs from the consensus of the other poetic imprints from this villancico tradition. This edition preserves the text in CAN but corrects a few phrases in which the consensus reading of the other imprints makes more sense both poetically and grammatically.

This piece is from the complete cycle of villancicos composed by Juan Gutiérrez de Padilla for the cathedral of Puebla de los Ángeles and performed at Christmas 1657.<sup>35</sup> This composer, whom the manuscripts refer to simply as Padilla, was born near Málaga in southern Spain around 1590.<sup>36</sup> He served as chapelmaster of churches in Jerez de la Frontera and Cádiz before emigrating to New Spain around 1622. In 1628 he was named assistant to Gaspar Fernández, the ailing chapelmaster of the cathedral of Puebla de los Ángeles. His earliest dated villancicos survive from that year.<sup>37</sup> Padilla succeeded to the post after Fernández died in 1629, and continued as chapelmaster at Puebla until his own death in 1664.

The only primary source for this villancico is a set of partbooks, each labeled Navidad del año de 1657 (Figure 3).<sup>38</sup> The Tiple I partbook has the additional marking “en 8 quadernos,” confirming the total of eight notebooks for the whole cathedral ensemble, typically organized in two choirs of four voices each.

The partbooks include all the villancicos needed for performance at Matins for Christmas and Epiphany of the 1657–1658 liturgical year, plus the hymn Christus natus est nobis.

Only six partbooks contain the music for Voces, las de la capilla, scored (as the parts indicate) a 6. Tiple and Bassus of Chorus II are not included. The Altus I and Tenor II parts for this piece include the composer’s name, “Padilla.” The partbooks show signs of repeated use over many years.

The bass part is in the partbook of Bassus, Chorus I, but this part plays with the voices of Chorus II throughout the piece. Typical of Padilla’s scores, this part only includes brief textual incipits to help an instrumentalist coordinate with the ensemble.

The handwriting, ink, and paper are consistent with that used in the composer’s other extant Christmas cycles in the cathedral archive, and it seems reasonable to believe this to be his own hand. There is a pronounced decline in the quality of the handwriting across each sets from 1651 to 1659, consistent with a physical decline in Padilla’s later years. In 1660, he signed a power-of-attorney document citing his failing health, and died four years later.<sup>39</sup>

The one previous edition of this piece contains an error based on the misreading of rests, as discussed below.<sup>40</sup> The one professional recording of this piece is based on an erroneous reading of the repeats.<sup>41</sup>

The setting is rich in musical symbols and puns that match the conceits about music in the poem. These are some of the less obvious examples:

- On cuenta (mm. 6–7), the voices sing a long, offbeat note that requires special counting, and this whole strophe is sung by Chorus I while Chorus II counts rests.
- In the respuesta (mm. 28–44), which mentions “the thirty-three”—Christ’s traditional age at his crucifixion—the voice parts have thirty-three notes in the original notation.
- Padilla evokes madrigal style with literal word painting throughout; in mm. 45–59 he depicts singing at the Christmas stable “in one choir and the other” through polychoral texture and imitation, and “three by three, two by two, one by one” by the number of voices.
- For “the sign of A (la, mi, re)” (mm. 67–69)—a reference to Christ as “alpha and omega” in musical terms—the voices sing pitches corresponding to the named syllables as they sing them; likewise for “his eyes set on mi” (m. 72).
- On the words peregrino tono (mm. 128–130), the A. I sings G–B♭–A–G, which is the final cadence of the plainchant tonus peregrinus in the transposed cantus mollis of the villancico.
- To illustrate the words máxima y breve, the T. II sings the word máxima on a breve (m. 153).

Structure of Repeated Sections

Like many of villancicos by Juan Gutiérrez de Padilla, this one begins with an introductory section for a portion of the ensemble. In the edition this is labeled introducción after the model of contemporary poetry imprints. Next the full ensemble sings the estribillo (refrain). Two coplas (verses) follow, the first sung by Chorus I and the second by Chorus II. Finally the estribillo is repeated.

The repeat of the estribillo is indicated clearly. In all the parts there is a signum congruentiae at the beginning of the estribillo (m. 45 in the edition). In every part except Tiple I, after the end of the coplas, the scribe has written the first few notes of the estribillo and the signum to point back to the estribillo.

40. Gutiérrez de Padilla, Tres cuadernos de Navidad: 1653, 1655 y 1657.

41. Juan Gutiérrez de Padilla, Música de la Catedral de Puebla de los Ángeles, Ars Longa de Habana, directed by Teresa Paz (Seville: Almaviva, 2005).

The introducción has two parts: the first section has two stanzas of poetry and is sung by Chorus I; the second is a respuesta (response) section sung by Chorus II. The one recording of this piece errs in performing both stanzas of the Chorus I section first and then performing the respuesta once. While that arrangement might seem logical, the parts all clearly indicate through the signum congruentiae, notated rests, incipits, and custodes that the first part of the introducción (with the first stanza of poetry) proceeds immediately into the respuesta, and then the whole section is repeated from the beginning with the second stanza of poetry. This means that the respuesta is sung twice, once after each stanza of the introducción.

Related Sources

A 1649 catalog entry from the collection of Portuguese King John IV appears to indicate an earlier setting of the same or similar text as Padilla's. The citation is listed under the works of Francisco de Santiago, who was chapelmaster of Seville Cathedral until his death in 1644: "Vozes las de la capilla. solo. Ya trechos las distancias. a 9."<sup>42</sup> The imprint survives for a related poem, Cantores de la capilla, which was performed at Seville Cathedral for Epiphany 1647. This was probably set to music (now lost) by Santiago's successor Luis Bernardo Jalón.<sup>43</sup>

 Annotation “Fiesta del SSantissimo de este año del 1674”
 Parts SATB, SATB, continuo only in coplas

In a rare case of a surviving draft score of a villancico, Irízar composed the piece in one of his makeshift notebooks made from received letters, with the music on the reverse sides and in the margins of the letters.<sup>44</sup> The score (S) is drafted with written barlines every two compases both in duple and triple meter; when a single odd compás is left at the end of a section Irízar groups it with what follows. When a colored (imperfected) semibreve extends across a barline, Irízar centers the note on the line, since mensural notation did not allow for ties.

The performing parts (P) appear to be in the hand of a professional copyist and correspond closely with the score. The score agrees with the parts in pitches and rhythms in the estribillo, differing only in a few cases of accidentals, where musica ficta practice made the notation of some accidentals optional. Generally, the edition uses accidentals that are present in either source, weighting the parts more heavily since these were actually used for performance.

The score lacks the General continuo part in the estribillo. In the coplas, Irízar originally composed separate four-voice settings of the first two coplas, but then at the bottom of the page drafted the setting for Tiple solo and continuo that appears in P, with a slightly different beginning to the continuo part. It may have been a later idea to combine the solo setting with the end of the four-voice setting for the Respuesta a las coplas on the “tag line,” “No se den por sentidos los sentidos.” This is the first use of the continuo, suggesting that Irízar decided after composing the rest of the piece to add the continuo part (General in P).

Lyrical Text

In S, Irízar simply wrote the poetic text out in a single line underneath each system, with no text underlay in the individual voices. Thus all text underlay in this edition is based on P. Figures only appear in the coplas.

The text corresponds closely with a poem later attributed to Vicente Sánchez in the Lyra Poética (Zaragoza, 1688), 171–172. Irízar died in 1684, so either he had access to an earlier version of Sánchez's text through his correspondence network, or Sánchez's text is an improvement on a pre-existing poem that Irízar used. Irízar does not include one of Sánchez's coplas and arranges the strophes differently.

The notated melody for the coplas does not fit every stanza equally well. The singer was apparently expected to adapt the rhythm to fit the poetry for the subsequent stanzas.

- Parts Solo, Acompañamiento

Jerónimo de Carrión (1660–1721), who succeeded Miguel de Irízar as chapelmaster of Segovia Cathedral after Irízar's death in 1684, sets a version of the same villancico poem as Irízar's Si los sentidos.<sup>45</sup> Carrión's text corresponds more closely to the version attributed to Vicente Sánchez in 1688. He follows Sánchez's ordering of the coplas but does not include two of Sánchez's coplas. Like Irízar, Carrión apparently expects the soloist to adapt the rhythm of the coplas to fit the poetry of the subsequent stanzas.

As in many later seventeenth-century villancicos, there is no sign indicating that the estribillo should be repeated. This repetition was customary with earlier villancicos, but the recurring tag line at the end of each copla may have made it unnecessary to repeat the whole estribillo.<sup>46</sup>

Compared to the other villancicos in this volume, the music in duple meter seems to call for a slower tempo relative to the music in C3, with a feel closer to modern  $\frac{4}{4}$ .

- i. Description MEX-Mcen: CSG.154, Manuscript performing parts from collection of the Convento de la Santísima Trinidad, Puebla Annotation “A 4/ D.<sup>n</sup> Joseph de Caseda” Parts SSATB; B. is instrumental

Like Salazar’s Angélicos coros (in this edition), this piece is in the Colección Sánchez Garza at CENIDIM, the Mexican national music research center, in Mexico City.<sup>47</sup> The collection is originally from the Convento de la Santísima Trinidad, a Conceptionist convent in Puebla. There are numerous works in the collection ascribed to José de Cáseda and his father Diego, who were both chapelmasters in Zaragoza.<sup>48</sup>

This is a set of individual performing parts. A tear along the fold at the bottom obscures a few of the notes. The parts bear the names of the convent sisters listed below. The name of the Alto, Madre Belona, also appears in Salazar’s Angélicos coros.

Tiple 1	Tomasita
Tiple 2	María de Jesús
Alto	Madre Belona
“Thenor”	Rosa María de Jesús
Bajo	(no name)

The bass part is instrumental: it has only incipits of the text and includes figured bass. Given the piece’s central conceit of Christ as a vihuela, that instrument would seem to be an apt choice to feature in the continuo group.

Coplas

In the original version of this manuscript, coplas 1, 4, and 6 are scored for the full ensemble and the music for them is written out only once. Coplas 2, 3, and 5 are sung by soloists with the same accompaniment part for each; thus the Bajo part for the solo strophes is only written out once in the MS. The full-ensemble coplas actually require small adjustments for the different text underlay, so they are all written out in full in the edition.

The MS includes repeat signs after the first phrase in every copla. In the solo coplas, the accompaniment has the repeat sign placed one semiminim later than the vocal lines, indicating a “first ending.” The edition simply writes out the repeated music in the solo coplas.

The Tenor part has an alternate setting of copla 4 written on a separate strip of paper and sewn onto the original performing part to cover the original music (Figure 8).<sup>49</sup> By lifting the sheet it is still

49. Many of the pieces in the Sánchez Garza collection have alternate versions, most commonly of poetic text, sewn possible to see most of the original setting of the solo copla 5, except for a few passages obscured by the stitching at the top. The music for copla 5, as edited here, appears to be identical to that for copla 2; the obscured passages are indicated with brackets in the edition.

The alternate setting on the sewn-in sheet uses a G<sub>2</sub> (treble) clef instead of the C<sub>3</sub> clef of the Tenor part, and duplicates the Tiple 2 line in the original full-ensemble setting of copla 4, except that the repeated high g'' in mm. 138–139 is replaced with d''. This version appears to be intended as a solo setting of copla 4, with the female Tenor switching to a higher register for this copla. Perhaps it was used in an abridged version of the piece with fewer coplas, or in a version arranged for reduced voices.

Solecisms

There are several instances of what appear to be compositional mistakes; I have argued, though, that these are intentional solecisms meant to communicate a conceit of musical “falsehood” (see copla 5).<sup>50</sup> The condition of the manuscript indicates frequent use, so any solution to these problems must account for the fact that the sisters actually performed the piece from these manuscripts, in their current form.

In mm. 3–4, there are parallel fifths followed by direct octaves in the outer voices, which cannot be avoided through musica ficta or any simple editorial correction. This is either intended by the composer, or was copied incorrectly. If intentional, it may be an error or an aspect of personal style. Since the text here is acorde (tuneful), and in light of other such oddities described below, this may be a deliberately ironic gesture.

In mm. 69–70, there appears to be a cross-relation between the Tiple 2 (B<sub>b</sub>) and the Tenor (B<sub>♯</sub>). On its own, the Ti. 2 would sing all B flats in this phrase, as no accidentals are included. To match the motive used throughout this section, though, the Ti. 2 would sing B flats in m. 69 and then B natural in m. 70.

The Tenor, though, has a sharp on the B in m. 44, normally indicating B natural (Figure 7); this would produce a cross relation. The Tenor B sharp is probably not a cautionary accidental because the phrase would not normally call for a ficta alteration, and it would seem more obvious to use a flat symbol for this purpose. Thus the most likely solution seems to be (as indicated in the editorial accidentals) for the Ti. 2 to break the motive and sing all B naturals.

- Annotation “Ensaladilla”
- Parts SATB, SATB; both bass parts are instrumental, with indications for bajón

This piece is part of Padilla’s cycle of villancicos for Christmas 1652 at Puebla Cathedral, copied as a set into individual partbooks, possibly in Padilla’s own hand.<sup>51</sup> This is the earliest of this composer’s extant Christmas cycles for which all the partbooks survive.

The partbooks bear the names of some of the Puebla chapel performers in various places. The name of Francisco Rodríguez is in the Tiple I part, and that of Sr. Nicolás Grinón is in the Tenor II.

The Puebla cathedral chapel was usually organized in two choirs, but since this piece does not utilize polychoral textures, the edition presents the voices in a single-choir layout.

This musical “salad” features multiple sections with contrasting styles with the names of songs or dances, which were likely based on specific music or types of music already known to the audience. Because of these multiple sections and large amount of repetition within sections, the parts are written in an abbreviated manner. This edition writes out most of the reprises and other repeated material to achieve a more straightforward presentation for performers. Examples of this include the stanzas of the Nuevo Troyano and the responsión reprise of the Papalotillo.

The piece has been recorded once prior to this edition.<sup>52</sup>

Bass Parts

Both bass parts are intended for instrumental performance. They have only incipits of the text to help orient the player. The Bassus I part contains this marking after the Nuevo Troyano and before the Papalotillo: “antes del papalotillo dice el harriero con el otro bajón” (Before the papalotillo the mule Skinner “speaks” with the other bajón). This implies that both bass parts were played on the bajón, not to exclude other continuo instruments like harp. The sections labeled Dúo (the Arriero and the beginning of the Negrilla)

51. Andrew A. Cashner, “Rhythm as Representation of Society in an Ensaladilla from Colonial Puebla, Mexico, 1652” (Paper presented at the annual meeting of the American Musicological Society, Louisville, KY, 2015); Cashner, “Faith, Hearing, and the Power of Music,” 406–462.

52. Juan Gutiérrez de Padilla, Maitines de Navidad, 1652, México Barroco/Puebla VII, Angelicum de Puebla, directed by Benjamín Juárez Echenique (Mexico City: Urtext, 1999).

are actually, in modern terms, vocal solos with accompaniment, perhaps intended for a single vocalist with solo bajón.

If a vocal solo with bajón is a Dúo, then the section marked Papalotillo Solo would seem to be a true solo without any accompaniment at all. The scribe has only written a four-bar accompaniment pattern in the bass, with unspecific indications to repeat. This edition therefore includes the bass line for the Papalotillo only for the responsión, though it is also plausible that the bass should repeat the same phrase as accompaniment for the coplas.

The “Gloria”

In the midst of the Negrilla, which caricatures people of African descent, an “Angolan” character (T. II) sings, “Listen, for we are singing like the angels.” Then the two upper voices of the first chorus (Tiple and Altus I) sing the angels’ song from Luke 2 in Spanish, “Gloria en las alturas y en la tierra, paz,” continuing in the ternary meter of the preceding section (Figures 4 and 5). This section is labeled “A 3” in the Tiple I part.

The Tiple II and Altus II parts contain only one phrase of notated music for the ensaladilla. Both are labeled “A 3 de la ensaladilla,” and contain music for the Spanish “Gloria,” but in C meter instead of the CZ meter of the other voices. The Tiple II melody quotes a common plainchant intonation of the Gloria in excelsis of the Mass.

The Tiple II part actually includes an earlier version in CZ that has been crossed out and replaced with one in C. The only way to align these voices with those of Chorus I is to maintain the theoretical 3 : 2 proportion of minims between CZ and C meter so that the perfect semibreve in CZ is equal in time to the semibreve in C.

The reason for the marking “A 3,” when there is notated music for four voices, is unclear. Given the crossed-out and corrected music in the Tiple II, it is also possible that “A 3” functions primarily as a rehearsal marking, and that Padilla changed his mind about the scoring after writing out the Chorus I parts, but left the marking intact.

Like Cáceda’s Qué música divina, this piece is in the Colección Jesús Sánchez Garza at CENIDIM, from the Convento de la Santísima Trinidad in Puebla.<sup>53</sup> The collection includes many works by Salazar, who may have been trained in Puebla before becoming chapelmaster at Mexico City Cathedral.<sup>54</sup> The performing parts bear the names of the convent sisters who performed them (Figure 6). The name added in a later hand to the Tiple I-I part, “Belona,” would appear to be the same person who performed the Alto in Cáceda’s Qué música divina.

Tiple	I-1	Madre Andrea, [different hand:] belona
Tiple	I-2	Madre Assumpson
Alto	I	Madre Sacramento
Tiple	II	Madre Thomasa, [on verso, different hand:] Alphonsa de S. <sup>ta</sup> crus [cruz]
Alto	II	Madre Rosa
Tenor	II	Ynesica Baeza
Bajo	II	Madre Mariana

The Guión part is in a different, less mature, hand than the others. It is written in portrait orientation rather than landscape, and includes barlines in the C meter sections. The part may have been recopied at a later date to replace a worn original.

The other modern edition does not indicate mensural coloration or specify added lyrical text and accidentals. In the coplas some of the lyrical text is incorrect (alcanzar instead of alcázar, sabe instead of cabe), and the text for the fourth copla is missing.

Qué música divina (Zaragoza and Puebla, ca. 1700)

What divine music,
tuneful and sovereign,

[INTRODUCCIÓN] A 4

Al establo más dichoso, donde triunfa la victoria,
principio a siglos de gracia,
la noche más venturosa, 5      Buena noche y la más buena, pues a pesar de las sombras en su mitad amanece
quién con tanta luz entolda.
Un zagal de aquel contorno, 10 en su templada zampoña,
tocando el Nuevo Troyano,
cantó en la pajiza choza:

At the most blessed stable,
where victory triumphs,
beginning of centuries of grace,
the most fortunate night,

A merry eve, the best,
since despite the shadows
at its midpoint dawns
one who with so much light overwhelms it.

A shepherd-boy from that scene,
on his tempered panpipes, playing the “New Trojan,” sang in the straw-filled hutch:

[NUEVO TROYANO] SOLO Y A 4

En Belén cantando estan, todo es gloria, todo es cielo,
15 y en un portalico pobre
se ha estrechado él que es inmenso.
Fuego derrite la nieve,
y entre tanta nieve el fuego
a cada llama bosteza, 20 lo acendrado deste estremo.
Míranse por todos lados,
en cada paja un lucero,
una antorcha a cada viso y un Dios grande aunque pequeño.

In Bethlehem they are singing,
all is glory, all is heaven,
and in a poor little stable
he who is immense has confined himself.

Fire melts the snow,
and among so much snow, the fire
yawns to each flame,
that which is purified from this extreme.

15R

Look around on all sides:
in each bit of straw, a blazing star,
a torch at each glance
and a God who is great, though little.

[INTRODUCCIÓN A 4]

25 Después Bartolo, él de marras, arriero de cala y gorra que fue espadachín de antaño,
y hoy mercader de panochas,

Next Bartolo—you know the one—
a mule Skinner in plain clothes, who was a swordsman in days gone by,
and now, a vendor of candies,

<sup>26</sup> de cala y gorra ] The manuscripts have cala clearly, but the meaning is unclear. Possibly a mistake for de capa y gorra (in plain, simple clothes) (DRAE).

<sup>28</sup> panochas ] In Mexican Spanish, slabs of hard brown sugar or candies made from them (DRAE); etymological source for English panocha (OED).

En busca de una mulilla 30 que se le fue por tramoya, a darse una buena noche
 en las pajas misteriosas,

Al portal con los pastores
 se entró arrojando bramonas 35 y a quién ocupa el pesebre, dice como que se entona:

In search of a little mule who went off from him in a scheme to give himself a merry eve
 in the mysterious straw,

30R
 Into the stable with the shepherds
 he entered, braying up a storm, and to the one who occupies the manger,
 he says as it is intoned:

EL ARRERO: RESPONSIÓN A DÚO

Señor niño, voto a San...
 ya lo dije, y esto sobra
 para que entienda que vengo
 40 puesto a lo de aquí fue Troya
 No se me asuste le digo
 ni de inocente se ponga, cuando me dicen que sabe
 lo que su padre no ignora.

45 Es bueno que de mis mulas,
 la más lucia y la más gorda
 me la traiga a este pesebre
 sin decir esta es mi boca,

Y yo sin haber vendido
 50 las cargas de mis melcochas, ande en flores y con flores pregonándola a mi costa.

55 Si arrobar viene a los hombres, parécmeme cosa impropia
 dar principio con mi mula, si no ha de ocupar carroza.

60 Pero ya he considerado,
 si mi decir no le enoja,
 que por la escarcha pretende
 el aliento de su boca.

Y por vida de Bartolo,
 que en aquestas y en esotras,

Sir Baby, I swear to Saint Somebody... well now I've said it, and it's more than enough for you to understand that I come on account of all this "Troy"/mess.

40R
 Don't be afraid of me, I tell you, Sir, or play innocent
 when they tell me that you know whatever is not unknown to your father.

45R
 It's just great that of all my mules, the most brilliant and the most fat should bring me to this manger without telling me anything,

50R
 And that I, without having sold all my stock of sweets,
 should have to play nice,
 hawking it at my own expense.

55R
 If you come to enrapture men
 it seems to me an improper thing to have my mule go first,
 if she's not even going to carry the wagon.

60R
 But now I've been thinking,
 if my saying so doesn't make you mad, that on account of the frost you ought to have the breath from her mouth.

And upon the life of Bartolo,
 whether in these things or any others,

37 Señor niño, voto a San... ] Bartolo refers to the Christ-child as "Sir" or "Lord," and addresses him with formal Usted forms, but in the same breath begins to curse, using a figure of speech that stops short of actual blasphemy.

40 lo de aquí fue Troya ] Idiom for a disastrous mess (DRAE); with double meaning referring to Bartolo's mule as a Trojan horse, bringing him unawares to the stable, and referring back to the "Nuevo Troyano."

46 the most brilliant and the most fat ] Or, "the nicest and fattest one."

48 sin decir esta es mi boca ] Idiom for keeping silent.

48 without telling me anything ] Or, referring to Bartolo rather than to the mule, "without anything to say."

51 ande en flores y con flores ] Andar en flores is an idiom for refusing to argue; con flores, possibly sweets.

53 arrobar ] Play on a robar (to steal).

- cuento por esto la quiera,
que aquí se las traiga todas.
 65 Abra esa boca de perlas
con que tanto me enamora, y pida que estos serranos
no pretendan otra cosa.
 Un baile quieren hacerle,
 70 que papalotillo nombran
y como cantemos todos, más que rueden las panochas.

PAPALOTILLO: SOLO

if you should want anything,
they should all be brought here for you.

Open that mouth of pearls,
with which I am so enamored,

They want to do a dance for you,
that they call papalotillo,
and so, let us all sing,
and let the candies go round all the more.

Come and you will see a genteel little boy.

Come and you will see a genteel little boy.
 75R Look on him well, for in his eyes I see myself.

Look on him well, how he cries and sighs,
which at the same time is his father's joy.

Look on him well: jewels among the poor,
a fertile seed hidden in the straw.

Look on him well, though now bundled up,
he will give us a fertile harvest.

Look on him well, with tenderness and care,
for he will be revealed as pasture and pastor.

Look on him well, a little lamb full of love,

70 papalotillo] Diminutive of papalote (kite or paper toy), derived from Nahuatl papalotl (butterfly) (RAE).

81 bundled up] Comparing the swaddled infant to a seed; in a theological sense, “confines himself.”

84 pasture and pastor] Pasto, livestock feed (and allegorically, the Eucharist); pastor, shepherd or religious minister.

88 farm owner] Labrador, landowner and employer of farm laborers.

91 El Angola Minguelillo] Diminutive of Miguel, an African of the Angolan “nation” or brand, likely a slave.

95 el tumbacatumba ] Apparently a nonsense word, possibly imitating African drumming and the sounds of Angolan languages like Kikongo. Cf. the refrain of Padilla’s 1651 ensaladilla, “Tumbucutú, cutú, cutú.”

98 desenvainó... de su tizón la tizona ] Mocking the voice and singing of this African character. Tizona means sword (after the Cid’s weapon), playing on the idea of Minguelillo leading a quasi-military “troop” (as in the Black Kings Festivals of New Spain). Tizón means a charred log or piece of coal, referring to Minguelillo’s dark-skinned, muscular neck, and to the perceived dark, gravelly sound of his voice.

99 Negrilla ] La negrilla (Little black song) is the name of a subgenre of villancico representing black characters, using pseudo-African dialect Spanish.

102 Diga plimo... busca ] Possible equivalent in proper Spanish: “Diga primo, ¿dónde está/ el niño de nacimiento?/ porque sabemos sus parientes/ y lo venimos a buscar.”

103 Aytá ] Written in MS as aytá and ayta; probably for ahí está (there he is), answering the question dónde sa.

107 aytá... cayentá ] “Ahí está,/ candela entre pajitas,/ su ojo como estrellita,/ y un buey y una mulilla/ con su bajo callentar.”

109 Turu turu yega,/ aytá, aytá ] Possibly, “Todos, todos llegan,/ ahí está”; or pseudo-African nonsense.

113 Caya... lo angelito ] Possible equivalent: “Calla, calla, mira, no le espanta,/ que duerme el chiquitito,/ Jesús, Jesús, qué bonito,/ esuchar, que cantamos a lo del angelito” or “a lo angélico.”

115 Valamindioso que lindo cantá ] Dubious possible equivalent: “Para mi Dios, O qué lindo cantar.”

[INTRODUCCIÓN] a 4

The musical score consists of six staves, each with a key signature of one sharp (F#) and a common time signature. The voices are as follows:

- TIPLE II (Treble clef): Starts with a half note C.
- ALTUS II (Treble clef): Starts with a half note C.
- TIPLE I (Treble clef): Starts with a half note C.
- ALTUS I (Treble clef): Starts with a half note C.
- TENOR I (Treble clef): Starts with a half note C.
- TENOR II (Treble clef): Starts with a half note C.
- BASSUS I (Bass clef): Starts with a half note C.
- BASSUS II (Bass clef): Starts with a half note C.

The score includes lyrics for three stanzas:

1. Al es - tab - lo más di - cho - so, don - de
2. Bue - na no - che y la más bue - na, pues a
3. Un za - gal de a - quel con - tor - no, en su

Below the lyrics, there are two sets of measures for each voice part, separated by a vertical bar. The first set of measures contains eighth notes, and the second set contains quarter notes. The vocal parts are separated by vertical bar lines, and the instrumental parts (Bassus I and II) are grouped together at the bottom.

3. Es bueno que de mis mulas,
la más lucia y la más gorda
me la traiga a este pesebre
sin decir esta es mi boca,

4. Y yo sin haber vendido

6. Pero ya he considerado,

que por la escarcha pretende

7. Y por vida de Bartolo,
